Earth Echoes is performed by members of the English Riviera Global Geopark alongside alongside Hugh Nankivell, Mark Laville, the GeoCollective, Doorstep Arts and Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra (BSO).

This is a wonderful opportunity to see a unique piece of theatre which will be streamed live into homes and schools across Geopark communities.

Gordon Oliver, Elected Mayor of Torbay, said: "The artists in our English Riviera Global Geopark have an international reputation for their outstanding work, developing new music and theatre inspired by geology. Earth Echoes promises to be a truly outstanding performance. I urge all our communities and schools to go online to watch it live along with international delegates from the Geoparks community".

Lisa Tregale, Head of BSO Participation, said: "Earth Echoes is such a great example of how music and the Arts can bring communities together to tell a personal story. The BSO are delighted to be involved in this project and cannot wait for the final performance."

Earth Echoes is a dramatic musical story of geology and the history of our planet. The premiere will open the 7th International Conference on UNESCO Global Geoparks, when over 700 delegates from around the world convene in Torbay. It will tell the fascinating story of our planet through voice, music, performance and multimedia.

Guided by a team of geologists, performers will travel through time and space and into the bowels of the earth. They discover how the continents form and change and track life from earliest earth to complexity of the life we know today.

There will also be a section on the great extinctions which reflects on where human activities started to have a significant global impact on Earth's geology and ecosystems.

This one-off performance will not be available for catch-up, so clear your diary and make sure you are ready to watch it live! Tune into the live stream online at www.englishrivierageopark.org.uk on Tuesday 27 September 2016, from 9.15am to 10am.

In September 2016, over 700 delegates representing the Global Geoparks, senior UNESCO officials, scientists, policy makers and government representatives from all over the globe will gather in Torquay on the English Riviera. The conference brings together experts from Science Education, Sustainable Economic Development, Community Engagement and the conservation of Earth's landscapes and Heritage.

The conference theme of Health and Well Being through Creative and Active Engagement will emphasise how Global Geoparks can lead the way in local, national and transnational wellbeing.

Stay tuned at 10am for the opening addresses, including renowned geologist Iain Stewart MBE, BBC presenter and Patron of the English Riviera UNESCO Global Geopark. The Earth Echoes programme, along with learning materials for key stages 2, 3 and 4, will be available online.

Earth Echoes has been funded by Arts Council England, Torbay Council, the English Riviera Global Geopark, Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra and Torbay Music Hub.
